

Real Estate Focal Points

Why focus on the Real Estate Market?

Following several years of spectacular commercial and residential sales within the real estate industry, the end of 2008 brought the industry almost to a standstill. The outlook for the real estate industry, although not as viable as it once had been, is full of areas of opportunity for not only the housing market but for the promotional products industry. Employed homebuyers will find it an excellent time to buy. Low mortgage rates are off the charts, housing prices have stabilized, government is providing tax incentives to first time homebuyers and inventory is abundant. Past decades have shown that real estate has been most lucrative following periods of recession. Many real estate companies can use this downtime to promote their name with potential new customers and help retain past customers in a competitive marketplace. The task of choosing a real estate agent can seem almost as daunting as finding a property because there are so many to choose from. Although lawyers, insurance brokers, home inspectors, movers, builders and contractors are all key players in these transactions, finding a real estate agent is usually the first step someone takes when deciding to buy property. There are over 1.3 million licensed realtors in the United States with over 600,000 listed as currently working real estate agents. Many of these realtors work for large agencies that have offices and franchises throughout the United States. How does someone stand out in a sea of real estate companies and agents? The number one way has always been promotional products. Real estate agents depend on promotional products to help get their agencies noticed, gain new customers and retain past customers.
